13. Summary of my Activities and Future Plans

My research focuses on two approaches. The first is the methodological approach, mainly the quantitative one on which I concentrate and specialize. In this framework, I am working on several studies and am co-writing articles dealing with the methodological field itself. The second approach to my work is sociological research. In this context I would like to concentrate on the research that deals with Israeli society and especially with the religious Zionist society in Israel. I would like to advance in the field of community research and prefer not to focus on one process or on one subject, but on a holistic understanding of society with emphasis on the national-religious society in Israel. The direction I am beginning to examine is how the national religious society in Israel, with its unique adaptations and understanding, processes, absorbs and shapes global and national cultural changes. In this context, I include the feminist issue in religious society and examine its' effect on demographic indicators such as age of marriage, numbers of children and employment. Another direction is the analysis of graduates of religious education a decade after leaving educational frameworks and who are in the initial stage of shaping their professional lives. I focus on the socialization processes they were subjected to as well as on when and where these processes occurred. Part of my work is applied research as part of an IDF research unit. since 1992 I have published several studies on a variety of topics. these reports are based on confidential data and are not academic conclusions which may be affected by copyright and are not thus available to me to use for academic advancement, but they are a significant part of my research work.
